

Appeasement.

Since the outbreak of World War II its origins have been at the heart of historiographical debate. Throughout this debate the policy adopted by Britain in relation to their foreign policy was that of appeasement. Whether such policy was a success or failure is another debate amongst historians that closely relates. Bickerston poses a view that to properly understand the past we often need to tackle the accepted interpretations head on. This notion can be readily applied to those areas of historiographical debate of appeasement. Historians such as R.M. Taylor are from

In the summer of 1940 a group of journalists known as CATO wrote "Guilty Men" which included their views on the failure of appeasement and placed the blame on the individual policy makers. They labelled "Chamberlain 'Guilty of Guilty men". This trio which consisted of Howard Odwin and Foot did not set out to challenge tackle any accepted interpretation as the source would suggest. However this only confirms Bickertons view as this trio did not set out to write history to properly understand the past. They wrote their history to protect British National Identity. They aimed to remove the blame on society of Britain and place it on their policy makers. Although ~~Bickerton's~~ view only partly applies to these areas of debate concerning CATO; we notice a deep reflection

This can be seen when Churchill was asked how he thought history will judge us. He replied "History will judge us well as I will write it".

~~it approached them based on the failure of appeasement at its origins.~~

of his view from later historians

Whilst Churchill is another fine example of an historian that fails to apply Bickertons view. Whilst this is the case it is important to remember that Churchill was part of setting the accepted interpretations of his time. Rather than tackling those interpretations he ~~added~~ continued with the ~~conception~~ that the appeasers had other options than appeasement and it was them ~~that~~ that was the primary origin of WWII. However it is important to note that he had his own political agenda. This pushed him to continue along with the accepted interpretation of the debate. He omitted information that he had secret access to, that indicated the appeasers had no other viable economic option but to appease.

Although Bickerton's view is not directly applied to Churchill as contextual influences and ~~methodology~~ ^{methodology} restricted him from tackling any accepted opinion.

However we see Bickerton's ^{largely} view applied to the debate when we note the works of AJP Taylor (Origins of WWII). AJP Taylor was more free than any before him to confront the accepted interpretations head on. ~~AJTP~~ + AJP Taylor recognises that the appeasers ~~were~~ failed but offers sympathy to them as he recognises they had no other economically viable option. ~~RM~~ Taylor reflects Bickerton's notion of tackling the accepted interpretations head on. As he is able to face up to the widely accepted view in order to understand the past. However it is important to note that AJP ~~w~~ Taylor was not restricted by the social attitudes of the time like CATO was to protect British national identity. AJP Taylor due to his brave and cunning historical arguments against the accepted interpretations of Churchill and CATO sparked a wave of new historians. These historians greatly apply Bickertons view to a great extent which noticeably reflects historiographical accuracy.

A fine example of such a historian is ~~FRANKLIN~~ Paul Kennedy who belongs to the revisionist school of thought on the origins of WWII and appeasement. Paul Kennedy, after the Falklands War and Cold war issues, was influenced to tackle the widely accepted notion that appeasement was the main cause to WWII. These issues reflected how this policy of appeasement is useful in preventing war. Another important breakthrough was the archive release in 1967 which allowed Kennedy access to information that furthermore allowed him to challenge tackle accepted interpretations head-on.

R.A.C. Parker was ~~simply~~ part of a new wave of historians known as the counter-revisionist and based on their context and purpose were able to successfully develop a argument to tackle the accepted interpretation from Kennedy. Paul Kennedy and revisionist historians.

R.A.C. Parker had access to more information and was freer than any other from his ~~as a~~ contextual influences to ~~g~~ accurately argue or the orthodox view and claim it as understanding the past. Parker's purpose is not faint as he aims to discover the past purely for his historical curiosity. This allowed him to do as Bickerton suggest and has to a large extent applied this to his version of the debate.

~~Historians~~ ~~only~~ ~~have~~ ~~had~~ ~~existed~~
Whilst the initial part of the debate the historians did not apply Bickerton's view it can be seen that those who are more free from their contextual influences like Parker to a large extent apply Bickerton's view and achieve some sense of historical accuracy and professional validation.
